Excerpt: . . . the following Marriage scene in which the grouping is harmoniously balanced, and the figure of the foremost suitor who derides Joseph, and that of the second priest who from the background looks reprovingly at the scoffer, are powerful and original in conception. The cloak of a third suitor is a fine study of drapery. The figures of the two chief actors however, and those of the followers of the Virgin, are somewhat awkward. N. 13, Mary being led to her husbands home appears, even beneath the defacing effects of time, an excellent composition. The procession is headed by the musicians, two of whom having reached the nuptial home, turn in expectant attitude, their heads being raised and their cheeks inflated to give greater sound to their instruments. The third player, who is about to arrest his march, bends slightly over his lute as if...
