Not illustrated. 1917 Excerpt: .of these exercises would be so framed as to include the application of all possible phases of technique to the accomplishment of tactical missions. In order to preserve the realities of war, the problem, when practicable, should be laid on ground that is unfamiliar to the participants. 150. The targets representing the enemy must present a logical appearance. Their position, arrangement, and movement should be such as might be expected from well-trained troops under the conditions of the exercise. As far as the mechanism of the target range will permit, there should not be left to the imagination any visible action of the enemy that can actually be represented by manipulation of targets. Representing, by targets, the troops with which it is assumed the organization is acting adds interest and reality to the exercise. 151. In presenting all possible phases of combat, there will be problems...
